An Assessment of International Conference for Reconstruction of Iraq

Onur Sultan*

Amidst great political turbulence in the run-up to the legislative elections, International Conference for Reconstruction of Iraq was held in Kuwait between 12-14 February 2018. The venue is ironic because Kuwait had become subject to Iraqi aggression in 1990 and had had for a long time strained relations with the country. It was the same Kuwait that hosted the conference for synchronizing efforts to reconstruct war-torn Iraq. This is a testimony to PM Haidar al-Abadi’s success in his efforts to internationalize Iraq’s problems and to repair relations with its neighbors and the Gulf.¹

In the conference Iraq presented feasibility studies and licenses for 157 major strategic (large) and middle-sized projects. According to Iraqi authorities, the estimated cost for those projects stands around $88.2 billion. A quarter of that amount is deemed necessary to jumpstart most urgent reconstruction efforts to normalize life in Iraq. The major strategic projects included:

- Four special economic zones (Babylon, Diwaniya, Nineveh and Baghdad),
- Five crude oil / petroleum product storage facilities (Bin Omar, Mosul, Tuba, Aziziyah, Samara’a),
- Rehabilitation and development of Mosul and Nasiriyah International Airports,
- Rehabilitation and development of one existing railway line (Baghdad – Diwaniya -Samawa - Basra) (610 km),
- Construction of five new railway lines ([Baghdad-Kut-Umara-Basra), [Musaib-Karbala Najaf– Semawa], [Basra- Shalamcha – Iran], [Mosul-Duhuk-Zakho- Turkey], [Baghdad-Baquba-Kirkuk-Erbil-Mosul] extending to total 2033 ksm,
- Rehabilitation and Development of Highways and Subways,
- Construction of Metro (Baghdad and Basra) and monorail (Baghdad and Karbala),
- Construction of Al Faw Port and Economic Zone,
- 25 thousand housing units in each province

Many of those projects have three features in common. First they are vague in nature based on the fact that they are at conceptual level. Second, Iraq’s need for them predates the war against Daesh. Last they are to a great extent designed to revive non-oil sector.

Iraq’s oil dependent economy is ailing because of plunge in oil prices, informal economy and corruption. Despite an 11% increase in real GDP based on 25% increase in oil production in 2016, the GDP growth was a humble 1.2% in 2017 because of an OPEC agreement to reduce oil production. The agreement which was extended until March 2018 had set a ceiling oil production level set at 4.42m b/d for Iraq. The opening of borders and the defeat of Daesh will certainly revive non-oil sector. However, its contribution to the economy will be gradual.

¹ Onur Sultan is a Ph.D. candidate and visiting fellow at Beyond the Horizon International Security Studies Group. He received his M.A. from the U.S. Naval Postgraduate School, National Security Affairs Middle East Programme and took role in execution of Defence Capacity Building Package for Iraq in NATO.
From governmental side, the federal budget is barely enough to pay salaries of its public officials not leaving much for investment. Despite some allocated budget for rebuilding provinces devastated by Daesh, major projects have to be funded by international donors.

Against this background, representatives, businessmen, statesmen from 74 nations, IOs, NGOs joined the International Conference for Reconstruction of Iraq. Most notable pledges came from Turkey. The country facing severe economic crisis made the highest pledge amounting to $5 billion in loans and investment. US on the other hand instead of making any direct pledge offered $3 billion in loans to American firms investing in Iraq. Britain pledged $1 billion in export credits over a ten year period. Apart from Iraq’s neighbors, Germany pledged €500 million and EU pledged €400 million. Some of the rest included pledges from Qatar by $1 billion in loans and investments and from United Arab Emirates by $500. Saudi Arabia pledged $1 billion from its Development Fund and another $500 million in export credits. Kuwait on the other hand pledged $1 billion in loans to Iraq and another $1 billion as investments. The pledges totaled to some $30 billion to much dismay of Iraqi officials.

The question is how should those pledges be interpreted? From Iraqi side the amount of pledges was well below what was expected. The US on the other hand did not make any direct pledge. Trump administration plans to cut most foreign aids, limit the budget of State Department by one third and to increase Pentagon budget by $195 billion over the next two years. This behavior showed the mentality change in US government after the election of Trump and verified his plan is being implemented.

Europe, on the other hand, had signaled a similar position based on slightly different arguments. Several Allies were vocal about the huge costs of their operations on the ground to defeat Daesh. They had hinted that they would not make sizable contributions based on those operational costs.

The sizable contributions came from Gulf and Turkey. For Turkey, Iraq has strategic importance for obvious reasons. The country is an important trade and energy partner. The Gulf countries on the other hand has somewhat different calculations. They have interest in balancing Iranian influence in Iraq. The occasion provides good opportunity to influence political landscape in the country.

Despite the fact that Daesh lost all terrain it controlled once as big as one third of the country it still poses great threat for the stability and security of the country and the region. The salafist jihadi network is in the process of going underground and recuperate enough funds to finance its coming steps. Still immensity of the problem did not generate expected support. One of the most important reasons for that is widespread corruption among Iraqi officials. Iraqi government does not build confidence in potential donors. The country ranks 166th among 176 states in point of corruption according to Transparency International. PM al-Abadi should make fighting corruption and cronyism a priority as he formerly declared.

Another important thing he should do is to build confidence. It is common knowledge that states pledge but not always honor those pledges. Al-Abadi government has to ensure those pledges are honored and turned into investment into the country. Both initiation and continuity of the pledged funds will be dependent on the spending behavior of the Iraqi government in point of reflecting the needs of all segments, ethnicities and sects of Iraq.\textsuperscript{2}

\textbf{NOTES}

\textsuperscript{1} Last month Kuwait and Iraq had agreed on transfer of Iraqi gas to Kuwait awaiting a final agreement on price. The latter had started to import low quantities of natural gas to meet peak demands. However, since 2013 ever increasing needs have pushed the country to import gas on continuous basis. After the crisis with Qatar, Kuwait tries to diversify its gas supply with a pipeline from Iraq. This trade has potential to benefit both sides. Alongside obvious reasons for Kuwait, for Iraq such trade will help pay off its some $4.5 billion reparations debt to Kuwait whereas it will also help eliminate wasteful gas flaring.

\textsuperscript{2} After declaration of the projects, Mr.al-Abadi was fiercely criticized for neglecting the Sunnite regions that were hit most hardly from the fight against Daesh.